- Whip

by SIMON HOGGART

LIKE SOME fearsome creature emerging from a dark lagoon, this week's great row in the Commons had its birth in the unfathomable mysteries of parliamentary procedure. Add to this the latest ploy from Mr Walter Harrison, deputy chief whip, and one of nature's most engagingly failed cheats, and you have a unique incident in constitutional history.

For weeks MPs have been complaining about the guillo-tine on the Scotland Bill. By cutting short debate at the end of each long period, it ensures that only a fraction of the Bill is discussed. So the Government had the bright idea of chopping each day into a set of mini-guillotines which would mean shorter but wider-ranging debates. The idea was suggested a week last Monday, the 16th and discussed in the business committee two days later.

This committee meets in utter secrecy. It has three Labour members, three Tories, a Liberal and an SNP man, none of whom may breathe a word about its arcane deliberations. It turns out, however, that last week one Labour Minister was absent and the committee was deadled the deliberations. deadlocked on the plan, which it only agreed on Tuesday last. Just after this, MPs discovered that the deputy speaker's choice of amend-ments meant that Mr Cunningham's controversial plan to make the new assembly de-pend on 40 per cent of the electors turning out to vote "yes" would not be debated. Instead of coming at the beginning of a long debate, it would come at the end of a short one. Without a debate, back-bench amendments cannot be voted on. Early on Wednesday afternoon, seeing the weight of feeling in the House, Michael Foot changed his mind, loudly and truthfully protesting that he had not tried to cheat. Mr Cunning-ham's 40 per cent amendment was swiftly reached, and a lively debate began, not surprisingly since it was designed and may yet succeed in killing Scottish home rule.

The next in line was Mr Grimond's amendment, alloworkney and Shetlands to opt out of devolution. The Government was nearly as keen for this to miss being debated and so miss being voted on. Because the 40 per voted on. Because the 40 per cent scheme was an amendment to an amendment, there had to be two votes, and us the deadline drew near the Government Minister John Smith was still talking, spinning out long and barely pertinent points. He faced a barrage of noise from Tories trying to make him stop and make way for the vote. Enoch Powell tried to close the debate. Then, bowing to the furore and no doubt fearing that the deputy speaker, Sir Myer Galpern, would shut him up soon anyway, Mr Smith sat down a few minutes before 10.30. It was just over half an hour before the guillotine was due to fall.

The first vote, to most people's surprise, was lost by the Government to loud cheers.
Just before the next one, an MP who favoured the Grithe Chief Whip Michael Cocks and his deputy Walter Harri-son and asked them not to allow Labour members to delay the second vote so as to shut Grimond out. The answer he got suggested to him that they had exactly that plan in mind.

Votes in the Commons take up to around 16 minutes, depending on how many people are voting and how long they have to reach the lobbies. The lobbies are long wide corridors, lined with books and clesks, even provided with lavatories. A vote isn't over until all the MPs have made their way out.

At the end of the second vole, the "no" lobby was the scene of a prolonged argurnent between three Labour whips: Mr Harrison, Mr Jack Dormand and Mr Jock Stallard, and three SNP rnembers: Mr Hamish Watt, Mr Douglas Henderson and Mr Andrew Welsh. It was perfectly clear to the people who watched them, Willie Hamilton, David Steel and later the Serjeant at Arms, dispatched briskly by the amazingly com-petent and crisp Sir Myer Galpern, that they were lurk-ing with the sole aim of making the vote last beyond the guillotine hour of 11 p.m.

It was a valid argument—about whether the Governrment should vote against the whole mutilated clause on the Referendum—but it was not the place to hold it. Whatever outraged expressions of innorence are heard in public, the recople involved in private say they knew perfectly well what they were doing.

What's so extraordinary is that it was always certain they would be found out.
Even if they had stopped Mr Grimond's amendment coming up, furious MPs would have demanded and probably get. demanded and probably got a vote later. The clue lies in the character of Mr Walter Harrison, the MP for Wakefield, a former electrician, and one of

The great loyalists of the Labour movement.

He is the skilled, behind-thescenes Mr Fixit and what he likes doing is winning votes for the Labour Party at almost any cost. Once, years ago, there was a similar row when he sent several MPs through both division lobbies in an attempt to drum up a phoney quorum for some bill. mevitably he was caught out then too.

DAVID LEIGH recounts the 30-year history of the Foreign Office's covert propaganda operation

Death of the department that never was

DETAILS ARE coming to light for the first time of the secret death, after a 30-year secret life, of a worldwide British propaganda network, operating against communism and mostly in the Third World. It was an operation which had falled to change with the times and within the last 18 months was purged largely on the orders of the then Foreign Secretary, Mr Tony Crosland. Among other things, Mr Crosland objected to its links with certain right-wing journalists.

The operation was radically reorganised into a smaller, still secret, Foreign Office department with a brief to sup-port British interests in general. Indeed, it is reported from a number of well-placed Whitehall sources that the new Foreign Secretary, Dr David Owen, is considering making hitherto confidential material openly available.

This would be the logical culmination of moves to bring the organisation—the so-called "Information Research Department" of the Foreign Office—under firm political control, and abolish its furtive Cold War attitudes.

IRD, as it was known, also performed a legitimate task of research and information. Indeed it can be argued that a successful propaganda operation must for most of the time provide objective and useful information Besides its activities abroad therefore, it provided an often valued service to journalists and writers in this country. That is the view of Guardian journalists who have been on its mailing list.

Journalists are accustomed to supping with a long spoon from all kinds of sources, and it is no reflection on any of them that IRD approval of them and they included some of the best known writers on foreign affairs. There is evi-dence that IRD did its best to disguise its real role in distributing propaganda from some of its clients: the operation, carried out over the entire 30 years since the war. was on the secret vote, and has never been made known to Parliament or public.

Since the last war, Britain has paralleled some of the covert international propa-ganda activities of the CIA, which have been documented and agonised over so extensively in the US.

As a former senior CIA official, Robert Armory, said, rather enviously in an interview 10 years ago, complaining of disclosures that the CIA funded student bodies and other organisations: "In free motherland of England . . everybody shushes up in the interests of their national security and ... what they think is the interest of the free world civilis-

Christo-pher Mayhew, then a junior Labour F. Minister, junior Labour F. Minister, invented IRD, writing a confidential paper to Ernest Bevin, the Ford gn Secretary of 1947. He proposed a covert "propaganda counter - offensive" against the Russians by means of a new FO department. Attlee called him down to Chequers to discuss it and until 1850 Mayhew ran IRD with Sir Ivone Kirkpatrick, then deputy under-secretary then deputy under-secretary at the FO and later chairman

The Department was secret. Britain was the first country to go over to the counteroffensive, Mayhew recalls, al-though the CIA and the US informalism agency were being set up at about the same time. IRD distributed material worldwide through

"We certainly did absolutely nothing to distort or twist the British media," he says. "Il was only black propagandain the sense that our work was all undercover and the existence of the department was confidential."

The main victims of the secrecy Seem to have been foreign mewspaper readers—and the British public who were kept in the dark, while non-accountable cold warriors went to work nominally at least, on Ets behalf.

The Russians knew about it from the very beginning because Guy Burgess, one of the three Communist defectors in the Philby affair, was posted to IRD in 1948. Mayhew wrote a memo sacking him after two months for being "dirty, drunk and idle." IRD was staffed with many emigres, from Iron Curtain countries, often journalists and writers specially recruited in this airless world. IRD officials themselves were screened from parts of what went on and ordered not to tell even other FO staff where they worked. Their task was set out in a document former staff recall, speaking of "forces" at home and abroad to be fought. Reference books to be fought. Reference books alluded only to IRD's "special tasks." In last year's diplomatic list the cover still kept up. IRD's job, it says, is merely "the compilation of information reports for HM missions abroad."

Modelled on wartime psychological warfare operations, IRD flourished in the 1950s. The staff of the Soviet section alone rose from 20 to more than 60. Embassies had resi-dent IRD men under cover

IRD's main targets were in the Third World — 'hitting back at Russian propaganda as hard as we could who planted material on local journalists and opinion formers. This was controlled first from offices in Carlton House Terrace, and then, as it expanded, from the 12-storev Riverwalk House, Millbank, in London.

A typical IRD operation in its heyday would have been, for example, to study Eastern block press reports of drunkenness and produce an article rubbing in just how rife alcoholism was under communism. Senior officials concede that past material was heavily "slanted."

The CIA, whose worldwide propaganda operations, radio stations and front news agencies have recently been extensively exposed, would call this

"grey" propaganda. It is basically factual material to which "at will. "spin " could be added

The el hical objection which is raised by IRD's critics both inside and outside Whitehall is that the public does not know what it is getting and so cannot make allowances for the "spin." It differs thus from simalghtforward propaganda for the British point of view whach is plainly no bad

IRD also encouraged book production described in Whitehall as "cross fertilisation." Robert Conquest, the scholar and author, who has been frequently critical of the Soviet Union, was one of those who worked for IRD. He was in the FO until 1956

After the left, he says, IRD suggested to him that he could combine some of the data he had gathered from Soviet mublications into a book. He sold Bodley Head a ready-male series of eight called "Soviet studies." Bodley Head says it published as a normal commercial arrangement selling 1.500 copies. a ment stilling 1,500 copies, a third of the total to a US publisher Fred Praeger. Praeger, who had published a number of books previously at the request of the CIA, also says this was a normal commercial arrangement. David Floyd, Communist affairs correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, also recalls writing a booklet on China at IRD's request. This was commissioned by IRD because they wanted to distribute it to distribute it to diplomats, they told him.

IRD's main targets were in the Third World — "hitting back at Russian propaganda as hard as we could," as Mayhew puts it, It also set out to "be of use to" British media an-dopinion formers. As well as supplying material to the BBC World Service, secret lists were compiled of approved journalists and trade unionists to whom material was offered if not always accepted. More often IRD simply offered quite straightforward research help. Recipients — often experts in their own fields — could and did judge its quality

By the time IRD was finally purged, one of its list contained a cross section of the General Council of the TUC. The journalists list contained about 100 names.

Those we have traced include two Labour journalist MPs, Roderick MacFarquhar and Colin Jackson. There were three writers connected

IRD was told to stop concentrating so heavily on communism and promote other British interests with the Financial Times; five from the Times; two from the Observer; five from the Sunday Times; five from the Telegraph; six from the Economist; one from the Daily Mail; two from the Mirror; one from the Sunday Mirror; and one from the Express. Guardian journalists on the lists included Hella Pick. Michael Simmons, Ian Wright and Victor Zorza.

Other journalists were informally blacklisted as politi-cally undesirable or had assistance withdrawn if they became politically embarrassing. British introductions to IRD were made discreetly: one distinguished liberal jour-

The Millbank office of the department—and some of its products nalist recalls how he was talsen to lunch at a London club by his retiring predecessor in the newspaper who passe draim on to his IRD contact. All journalists were told as little as possible about the Department. Material was sent to their homes under plain cover. Correspondence marked "personal" carries no departmental identification or reference.

They were told documents were prepared in the FCO pri marily for members of the daplomatic service, but we are allowed to give them on a perso nal hasis to a few people outsicle the service who might findt ham of interest . . they are not statements of official policy and should not be attributed to HMG, nor should the litles themselves be quoted in discussion or in print. The papers should not be shown to anyone else and they should be destroyed when no longer needed."

Eventually IRD's star began to wa.m. It was cut down in 1964 axid again in 1968, formeremployees say. In 1970 under the then PUS, Sir Denis Greenhill, it was in sasinca according to siasince according to several government sources. Around this time IRD was told to stop concentrating so heavily on communism and promote other British interests. It set up a counter sub-version unit to deal with the IRA. It was also encouraged to mode rate its briefing mat-

It published a loose leaf manual, The IRA—Aims, Policy, Tactics, delivered amongo thers to Ian Hamilton at the Iristitute for the Study of Comfid. It included intelligence made risk and description gence malerial and descriptions of IRA front organ is tions in Ireland, the US and Britain. The aggressive cold war stance, however, was still unpopular with the

FO. There was a natural distaste for an "outsider" department and the staff of IRD were regarded as at least old-fashioned.

Publications included, for example, lists of Communist front organisations such as the forthcoming world youth festival in Havana and booklets on African, Asian and Russian affairs, as well as a cyclostyled Background Briefing at regular intervals.

By 1976 IRD was no longer secure in its covert tasks. Sir Michael Palliser, the new PUS and a "reforming bureaucrat" as one colleague describes him, ordered a hard look to be taken at it. Sir Colin Crowe, former High Commissioner in Canada was brought out of retirement to brought out of retirement to investigate. It was as a result of his report that Labour Ministers became aware of IRD's approved list of British contacts. They — from their own political standpoint — were alarmed, according to several Government sources, with the political complexion several Government sources, with the political complexion of a handful of them including Mr Brian Crozier, director of the Institute for the Study of Conflict. There were interchanges with the head of IRD. Mr Ray Whitney, currently shortlisted for the Tory seat of High Wycombe. The list was pruned by Tony Crosland Mr Crozier asked about this episode, refuses to discuss it with us. "I regard the Guardian as a hostile newspaper," he says.

A second internal inspection of IRD followed. Owen was apprised of the situation when he took office and authorised the disbandment of IRD in May '77.

The Think Tank inspectors have reported FO information departments were being re-organised. In fact 20 or 30 IRD-staff were retired, made redundant or transferred to redundant or transferred to the research department pro-per. Almost £1 million was then being spent by the FO on "unattributable" propa-ganda. The Think Tank was scathing about the value of information work in general but said unattributable material had a role in creating "helpful political attitudes" in the more influential Third World countries. Government Government propaganda has not stopped. A new department, Overseas Information Department has been ation Department has been set up inside the FO proper, much smaller and with a much wider brief. Senior Government figures emphasise no domestic propagandising as such goes on since Owen's arrival. It is also reliably reported in Whitehall that Owen is even considering deep Owen is even considering declassifying these background briefs and making them available to press and public over the counter. This would be an extraordinary departure: IRD itself died as it lived for 30 years, a secret kept from the British public.

GUARDIAN DIARY

Martin Wainwright

LIFE for a South African housewife can be awfully boring these days, with all those. useful black people to do the daily chores. So what better, after a bit of squash and a spell on the small arms range, than to tackle an Open University course? You can't take a degree, of course, as that privilege is reserved for people living in Britain and a handful of students in the States. But you can struggle through all the units and modules and videotapes and what's more the OU makes it as easy as possible for you to do so. Surprisingly, in view of the Labour luminaries involved in the institution (Sir Harold Wilson, founder; Lord Garwhich, founder, Lord Gardiner, the current chancel-lor), the OU is proving boundlessly keen to sell its productions to the South Africans. Up to 25,000 course units are estimated to reach the Benthlie service. the Republic every year via the Open University's Educathe Open University's Educational Enterprises subsidiary at Milton Keynes. So lucrative is the trade that the OU is now risking industrial action and vast dismay among its staff by persisting in flogging the material. The Association of University Teachers which embraces Teachers, which embraces most of the OU academic staff, takes the line that its members should not teach in South Africa; and the OU units, which are mostly written by the body's staff, are simply an extended form of teaching.

When the AUT raised the when the AUT raised the matter last summer, the university Senate voted 2-1 to do "everything in its power" to stop the trade. So astonishment was rife when the last Senate meeting, at the end of the year, heard that the Educational Enterprises board had not see and dered the had not yet considered the matter. The teachers are now intending to take constitu-tional steps to reprimand the body or, failing that, to consider more drastic action. Paradorically meanwhile, their one ally has proved to be the South African Premier, Mr Vorster, whose police aware of the dangers of some forms of knowledge, have turned back units on racialism and capitalism at the borders.

THE DREADFUL plagues predicted in this Diary for the Arckillects' Registration Council, after they decided to invest to South African mines, have begun. Nigeria, one of the most lucrative one of the most lucrative overseas markets for British architects, is considering a boycott because of the ARC's stake. The sum involved, which the architects, you remember, defended on all manner of principles, is $158.10

Going Dutch

IF AND when things get bad for Britalm abroad, the country can count on one staunch Anglophile in Rotterdam, Holland. He ks Mr Peter Alsem, whom you last read about in connection with a Post Office phone kiesk.

Mr Alsem took a shine to one of these while over in Norfolk buying Lotus cars, for which he holds the main Dutch cornession. The box was shipped over with a batch of Lotuses and if you ring Mr Alsemathis Rotterdam home he answers you from inside the booth

Not content with this, the Dutchman has now requested Lotus for some more wrought iron, in this case a Post Office iron, in his case a Post Office letterbox Obligingly, the company contacted the Norwich postmas ter and a George VI wallbox, £45 compared with the £50 for the kiosk, will shortly be off to Holland and fitted up to take the Alsem mail

Wilder still THE WILD scenes in the Commons, with MPs in opera hats and forming human barricades, were nearly made much wilder by Mr Sydney Bidwell. The burly MP for Southall, a former railway shunter, b was a devastating weapon presented to him, after the sampaign on turbans after the campaign on turbans and crash helmets, by Britain's graleful Sikhs. Britain's graleful Sikhs.

Engraved and bejewelled, it's a ceremonial sword which the playful Mr Bidwell has a habit of hanging on the old sword hooks, still maintained in the House though never used. Spotling the Serjeant-at-Arms moving in on the mob with his weedy rapier, Mr Bidwell is pt into action.

"That thing," he cried, "is useful only for picking up litter in parks. Why not, Mr Serjeant, It me offer you something better?" Fortunately for the Conservative Party, the melee at that point subsided, and the warlike Mr Bidwell's plan was shelved.

THE MOST successful busters of the pay guidelines so far are the members of the Ostrich, Fancy Feathers and Artificial Flower Wages Council. According to the Employment Department's monitoring services, their 20.4 per cent rise is the largest to be let through by the Whitehall scrutineers. Since the rise was £5.50, though and since it takes the industry's minimum weekly wage to £32.40, it may perhaps be allowed that it was their turn.

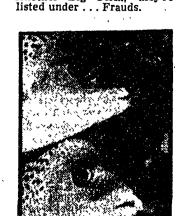

Tip top

AS YOU know, Diaries pay enormous sums for interest-ing tips, but today we're in the unusual position of credit-ing our Chief Accountant. Eagle-eyed, he spotted some strange goings on in the index of Accountancy magazine.

of Accountancy magazine.

This model journal, the paper of the Institute of Chartered Accountants, provides a comprehensive index to the year's reports with neat subheadings such as Auditing. Interviews and Ethics. Unfortunately one of the most important ones, Government, was missed out in this year's production. production.

As a result the various entries, such as Denis Healey's Reflationary Package and Healey's Selective Aid and Healey's Selective And Scheme, appeared under a new heading. Along with Auditors Detect Expenses Irregularities and Rebuke for Another Big Firm, they're listed under . . . Frauds.

SOMETHING fishy going on? Well, I'm afraid it looks like it. A large school of the creatures (detail above) has been chosen by some subversive for the cover of the latest quarterly review from the Crown Agents.

Are you losing the warmth of your family?

Now!save up to 25% off your heating costs by installing cavity wall insulation

Keeping your family warm continues to be a cost that grows faster than almost anything else. Did you know that heat loss through cavity walls costs you 35p in every all you spend on heating? Ufoam PEus cavity wall insulation developed by ICI can save you three quarters of the money you lose through your walls... which means about 25% of your heating bills.

Ufoam Plus developed by

installit

Ufoam Plus is injected into the cavity wall of your house from the outside, where it quickly goes to work saving you money - keeping you warm. Once installed, it needs no maintenance and even carries a 30 year guarantee!

Free Expert Advice

Cape Insulation Services experts will survey your home-tell you if it's suitable for cavity wall insulation, how much it will cost, free of charge and with no obligation to Send the Freepost Coupon below, or telephone us at our expense by asking the operator for Freefone 2179 at any time. Freepost Coupon (No Stamp required) Just address envelope as follows: do not a fix slimp.

We pay postage, UK Mainland only. Address to: Cape Insulation Services Limited Freepost, Welwyn Garden City, ALS 6LY. Please ask one of your representatives to make ear appointment to survey my house without obligation

G.27.1

Reproduced with permission of the copyright owner. Further reproduction prohibited without permission.